In order to investigate the functional significance of the translational activity of the nucleus in Acanthamoeba castellanii, the transfer RNA (tRNA) localization in nuclear and cytoplasmic fractions was examined using an antiterminator antibody and fluorescein-labeled tRNA. The nuclear tRNAs were found to be distributed throughout the entire nuclear volume of the acanthamoebae. The in vitro labeled cellular proteins were fractionated into cytoplasmic and nuclear fractions and subsequently fractionated into polysome and translationally nonpolysomal subfractions. The polysomes were further fractionated into 60S (monosome) and 48S (polysome) fractions. The nuclear tRNAs were found to be absent from the translationally inactive monosome fractions and were exclusively present in the polysome fractions. When the monosome and polysome fractions were translated in a cell-free system, the polysomes were shown to function to a greater extent in tRNA-mRNA associations than the monosomes. These results suggest that the nuclear tRNAs are not translocated to the cytoplasm but rather stay in the nucleus where
