-bottom flange or flanges, a second symmetrical surface having surface areas provided at the ends of the first symmetrical surface opposite the first surface and configured to receive a relatively rigid strip of sheet metal, a second insert or second counter-fitting arranged to be interposed within the end flange of the flange or flanges or to the second symmetrical surface of the base, the second insert defining a pair of parallel channels for receiving the ends of the relatively rigid strip of sheet metal to form a second flange or flanges, a first symmetrical surface having surface areas provided at the ends of the second symmetrical surface opposite the second surface and configured to receive a strip of sheet metal, and a second insert or second counter-fitting arranged to be interposed within the ends of the second symmetrical surface opposite the second surface. The relatively rigid strip of sheet metal may include two rectangular or two circular hollows or any combination thereof. The rectangular or circular hollows may further include means for securing to the base and/or the second insert or second counter-fitting. The securing means may include a plurality of circumferentially extending arcuate grooves or the like formed around a perimeter of the rectangular hollow or of the circular hollow and a plurality of circumferentially extending ribs forming locking members mounted on the base and arranged to define such arcuate grooves. In accordance with another aspect of the invention, there is provided a method of forming a novel counter-fitting for use in conjunction with a relatively rigid flange or flanges for clamping a relatively rigid strip of sheet metal, the method comprising the steps of forming a base having a surface area provided at an end of the base opposite the end to be inserted into the flange or flanges and having first and second symmetrical surfaces extending along a common axis, and forming a second insert or second counter-fitting arranged to be interposed within the end of the base. Ultrasound-guided multiphase centesis. Multiphase centesis is a useful technique in the management of many pelvic inflammatory diseases. The technique is performed under ultrasound (US) guidance. We report the successful US-guided use of this technique in 16 women and two men. We used a low-frequency curvilinear transducer, a 4-cm long, 1- to 2-mm diameter, 16-gauge spinal needle, and local anesthetic. The influence of the thickness of thick muscular electro-conductive fabrics on muscular fatigue. It is shown that the thickness of the electro-conductive fabrics used to guide the current between a source of stimulating current and the excitable tissue under investigation affects the development of muscular fatigue. When using thicker fabrics the excitability of the muscles decreases faster and fatigue does not develop. In contrast, when thinner fabrics are used the excitability decreases slower and fatigue develops before the stimulating current ceases. Experimental results show that in a frog muscle fatigue does not develop when the strength of the stimulating current is below a certain threshold. Above this threshold the strength of the stimulating current necessary to maintain the excitability constant is also a function of the thickness of the conductive fabric. This is the reason for the differences in the fatigue development for different fabrics. * * * [1]For a full analysis of this process, see Dr. Aberson's note. Professor Foster himself says, "There is no need to dwell on the matter, because the stages cannot be separated, but it must be remembered that the definition of embryonic mortality depends upon the order of appearance of these three facts." [2]See for the faith and fortitude of Dr. Larue, the coroner of Chambéry, the very man who defended the decapitation of Liseuse in 1872, and who was responsible for the passing of the Fédération Sociale order of 1879. [3]See the London "Times." [4]My faith in the logical acumen of the French media (the journalist being a keen student of psychological matters), as well as my optimism, led me to apply again for the prosecution of these errors, and received the following answer:--"The medical advocate of the deceased, who was the only living witness in this affair, has refused for the third time to reply to the questions. He refuses, as was to be expected, because he is an important character in the kingdom. "His behaviour is quite inexplicable; he is, as you may imagine, the hero of the surgeons, the most eminent among them. We have been greatly astonished at the remark which M. G. F. made to the special magistrate, who was quite well informed about the affair. On the contrary, he says that, without
