The

neocortex is important for the processing of sensory information and plays a crucial role in motor and cognitive functions. Serotonin (5-hydroxytryptamine, 5-HT) is widely distributed in the neocortex and a large body of evidence suggests that it may be involved in the modulation of cortical information processing. Serotonergic afferents from midbrain raphe nuclei may modulate neural activity in cortical circuits. There is also a vast innervation of pyramidal cells by local neocortical 5-HT neurons. Neocortical serotonergic terminals are located near neurons that project to the thalamus or the hippocampus. Neurons which innervate the cortex can be excited by 5-HT released from these terminals, suggesting a potential role for the modulation of corticocortical connections. A recent study has shown that inhibition of cortical 5-HT receptors by a local infusion of 5,7-dihydroxytryptamine in the prefrontal cortex selectively impairs the performance of working memory, a form of cortical function that is mediated by 5-HT projections from the midbrain raphe nuclei to prefrontal cortex. Furthermore, activation of 5-HT1A receptors in the prefrontal cortex of rats improves performance on this cognitive task. These results support the idea that neocortical 5-HT is involved in the modulation of cortical functions, including working memory.[The morphological peculiarities ca3bfb1094

B2.3 Portfolio of members. Every member needs to register with the mailing list as described in this document. The description of the portfolio is defined by the portfolio description document: * `ListPortfolio`: * The collection of members in the portfolio. The request `ListPortfolio` returns only the collection of members that are not automatically unsubscribed from the mailing list. * The collection of projects that the members have worked on. The request `ListPortfolio` returns the list of projects that the members have worked on. * The list of members in the portfolio that have read all documentation. The request `ListPortfolio` returns only the list of members that have read all documentation.
